Précis of 100 Words or Less:	Since 1977, US firms have been prohibited from bribing foreign officials under the Foreign Corrupt Practices Act. As a result, many traditional competitors of US multinational firms have been willing to pay bribes to foreign officials as a marketing ploy to win sales at the expense of their American counterparts. Because bribery of public officials is widespread in many developing nations to facilitate overseas sales, US firms lost significant overseas contracts while their foreign competitors gained market share. Recognizing the dilemma that American firms are in, successive US administrations have led the charge against bribery and have attempted to get other nations to join in the battle. This paper traces the US attempts to curtail official bribery, and details new information outlets and laws passed by other nations to be used as weapons as they join in the US-led fight against bribery.
